

Discussion

I argue that the district court erred in finding my conviction was counseled. I argue that the three panel appeals court of the Ninth Circuit erred in finding my appeal was counseled. If a record of conviction does not indicate representation by counsel ... or an effective waiver, the defendant enjoys a presumption that he was denied his right to counsel, and that his conviction is therefore void. See Burgett v. Texas, 389 U.S. 109, 114 (1967); Carnley v. Cochran, 369 U.S. 506, 516 (1962) (holding presumption of waiver from a silent record is impermissible).

Exhibit A: This is the District Court's docket, purposely filed out of order to support the appearance of the decision of the court as coming "before" the objection to the denial of the right of counsel on first appeal of a conviction.

Exhibit B: This is the true order of event's corrected in order and dates showing the decision of the court as coming "after" the objection to the denial of the right of counsel on first appeal of a conviction.

Thus, the actual record of the conviction shows entitlement to counsel but is silent as to waiver of representation, and is therefore presumptively void.

What is worse, far worse, is the court using it's own denial of a fundamental right, in it's next breath use that denial as an excuse to refuse to even hear an indigent's pro se motion for reconsideration. Thus, effectively leaving him with no voice at all.
